NATURAL ARCHITECTURE – A DESIGN FOR LIFE AT SAMUJANA

18 JUNE 2015: Primitive landscapes, indigenous rock outcrops and native vegetation were all intrinsic to the architectural design of Samujana; Thailand’s luxurious, most sought-after villa estate on Koh Samui.

Nothing more than a vision in 2003, Samujana – now perched on a beautiful hillside over-looking a magnificent coral cove – officially launched nine years later, with award-winning architect Gary Fell of GFab Architects heading up their dedicated design team.

Each month now brings with it a brand new deluxe villa, unique to the Samujana villa estate and unveiled as part of their second phase of properties.

Inspired by the breathtaking landscapes of Koh Samui and artfully crafted using locally sourced materials – some of which was excavated from surrounding formations – Thailand’s symbolic backdrop played a vital part in the creation of these expansive holiday homes, with great importance placed on a feeling of “openness” and strong ties to nature.

Links to the surrounding area can be found visually throughout each individually designed villa too. Such aesthetics are apparent in the estates flawless landscaping, contemporary interior design and even structural choices; including the external stone walls constructed using natural materials which not only effortlessly control property temperatures, but also provide robust, weather-proof material whilst effectively blending and anchoring all villas to the Samujana site.

Offering additional privacy and accentuated luxury through the use of individual design, each Samujana villa occupies oversized en-suite bedrooms, fully equipped kitchens, infinity-edge pools, Jacuzzis and plunge pools, open-air lounges, rooftop terraces, a TV lounge – and in some cases private cinema rooms.

Samujana places simplicity and openness at the forefront, daring to exist in harmony with nature.
